OMAHA'S SANITARY LAWS.

Commissioner Andrew Issues a Card to the Public.

Sanitary Commissioner Philip Andrew is experiencing some difficulty in getting the affairs of his office into proper working shape.

The business of the office was conducted, prior to Mr. Andrew's term, in such a haphazard, careless manner, that the citizens generally do not understand what his duties are nor do they appreciate the fact, apparently that he has the authority to enforce the regulations he is working under. Mr. Andrew has prepared the following statement for the benefit of citizens and property owners generally:

All measures of reform, in any direction, often meet with decided opposition from parties who, in their own minds, are sure that their rights are infringed upon by the enforcement of such measures. Nothing will aggravate the opposition more than to see the authorities act in a haphazard, careless manner, that the citizens generally do not understand what his duties are nor do they appreciate the fact, apparently that he has the authority to enforce the regulations he is working under. Mr. Andrew has prepared the following statement for the benefit of citizens and property owners generally:

Cutting Up Corn. As the time is now at hand for the cutting up of the corn fodder, we publish the following suggestions from "Uncle Andrew," clipped from the columns of the Journal of Agriculture.

"One of the most important things for the farmers is to make good fodder. My experience is that the best time is as soon as the husk is one-third dry. My way is to have the shocks fourteen hills square, unless the corn was very light or very dry. As it is liable to mould, tie the galls in the center of the proposed shock if the hills are good stout ones. I always insist on having good stout hills for galls. Hills would rather have the galls in the center than in the corners of the stalks. Commence at the southwest corner of the proposed shock; facing north, cut two rows north till within the galls, then turn east with one row, and set up the load as usual. Then go to the northeast corner facing south, cut two rows south till even with the galls, then one row west to the galls, setting it up on the north side; then go to the southeast corner, facing north, cut two rows north till even with the galls, then one row south to the galls, setting it up on the north side; then back to the southwest corner, cutting same as before but setting up the load on the southwest corner of the shock. Do likewise with the other two corners, then there will be just one load for each side. Set up the one on the southwest corner of the shock, the one on the northeast on the east side; the one on the northwest on the north side; the one on the southeast on the south side; then the shock is well balanced. In setting up the shocks, do not cut up the galls, but set up slanting enough to point up well at the top; then it will turn rain. I never tie the shock; if they are put in this way they do not need tying and it saves time, which is of some value at this time of the year. In my experience of three years, I have not lost any more than those that tie the shocks.

The first damp shock that comes after the first heavy rain is the best for making up my fodder and corn all together. I never haul it out when it is very wet, as it will cause it to rot. I set it up in winrows, running east and west, that will be about four feet apart. I then place the butts of the fodder on top of the winrow near the center, letting the tops hang down on the south side; then place the fodder the same way on the north side, only let the butts extend about six inches above the butts on the other side. This will make a good roof for sheltering the fodder. Then husk out all the ears you can see on the outside to keep the chickens from scratching at them, and the corn will be better. Never husk out the fodder in the field, as it necessitates traveling over the ground twice while it is wet. Another great drawback is, when husked in the field, the husks are generally laid flat down in the field and the corn in a scattered heap, and both left to await the good pleasure of the very busy farmer. The result is one that is generally soggy and water-soaked, and the corn is then nearly rotten and the fodder is about as palatable to stock as rotten wood, and contains very little more nutriment. When it is all hauled in together it can be husked out at 'old spots,' and then hauled to the crib and fodder winrowed in the same way as before. Some of my neighbors have considerable trouble to get their stock to eat fodder that is husked in the field. I have never had any trouble to get enough of it for my stock to eat, as my mules and cattle prefer it to good timothy hay."

virtuous and Puritanical in her ear and speedy days. A Sunday closing decree was promulgated there two weeks ago providing that all places of business, with a few exceptions, shall be closed on Sunday. The exceptions are the railroad and steamship offices, for urgent business only; hotels, drug stores, restaurants, cook shops, bakeries and the like. But the exempted places that sell spirits are requested to post a big placard notifying that no drinks will be sold before 4 p. m., when the prohibition closes. The market, grocery stores and barber shops may be open until 11 a. m. The newspapers continue to announce the winning numbers in the Sunday drawings of the Panama lottery, so presumably the lottery is exempted as a necessary business.

Can Hog Cholera Be Prevented?

An affirmative answer to this question is more important than a like answer to that other question so often asked, namely: "Can hog cholera be cured?" Of course, when a fatal disease has once attacked a herd of swine the most important question to the owner and the one for the answer to which he is willing to pay most readily, is: "Can the disease be cured?" But disease, even if not fatal, is always harmful, so that if the owner can prevent it he is far better off than if he is unable to prevent but is able to cure it.

In this, as in many other matters, no teacher is so valuable as experience. Mr. Hansford, a Shawnee county farmer, whose address is North Tappan, gives an affirmative answer to the first question. So certain is he of his ability to prevent hog cholera that he has bought uninfected hogs out of swine herds in which the cholera had never been, and he is willing to pay more for them than for those which have been lost a hog by this dread disease. Mr. Hansford's preventive is as simple and cheap as it is sure. His custom at all times is to feed salt to his hogs, just as regularly as he salts his cattle. If the hogs are accustomed to salt they will at first eat too much if it is given them. The only harmful consequence of that is that it will vomit them, but they soon recover from this. But when accustomed to salt, hogs, as well as cattle, should be given as much as they will take. When properly salted and well fed, hogs are very little disposed to root in the ground, or, as Mr. Hansford puts it, "you do not see them standing on their heads in holes in the ground hunting for salt."

When hog cholera is feared Mr. Hansford feeds his hogs "roll sulphur." They will not eat the common form of sulphur, and it is therefore no use to give it to them; but they eat roll sulphur readily, and when once they know it, run after it. Of course Mr. Hansford avails himself of such opportunities as present themselves of giving his hogs the range of a field, but he relies on salt and sulphur as his chief preventive of disease.

Some facts were given to the Kansas Farmer in a conversation one day last week.

A Society Fable. Detroit Free Press: A horse, made restless in the night by reason of the sounds of revelry in his master's palatial mansion at the other end of the lot, slipped his halter and in the absence of his master, who was in the basement making love to the chambermaid, he strolled leisurely out into the back yard and came to the house.

Pearing into the windows, which were open for ventilation, the horse heard the conversation of numberless Nice Young Men present, and old ones also, and observed, too, the general style of them. The more he heard the less favorably he became impressed, and when One at a rear window blew a cloud of Cigarette smoke into his face, the limit was reached, and the horse boldly walked up through the Port cochere and was half way into the large and elegant hall of the mansion, when his Master hearing the unusual disturbance, came forth.

"Get out!" he exclaimed angrily. "What in thunder are you doing here?" "Going into society," replied the Horse, in a soft, pleasant voice. "Well, you can't come in here. This is no place for you."

"Why not?" inquired the Horse very respectfully. "Because it isn't. You belong in the stable."

"Rats," answered the Horse, forgetting his training and manners; Society relegates a Horse to the Stable, when it welcomes so many Donkeys to the Parlor."

His Master was so greatly shocked by this heretical utterance that he caught up a heavy Whip from the Hat rack and laid it across the Horse's back, who was really glad to get back into his stall.

Grant's Offer of the Chief Justiceship to Conkling. This correspondence is worth reading now, as it is in autobiographic form in Conkling's Life.

Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C., Nov. 8, 1873. My Dear Senator: When the chief justiceship became vacant I necessarily looked about me to determine whose appointment would be most beneficial to the country and acceptable to the country at large. My own preference went to you at once. I had determined and announced that the appointment would not be made until the meeting of congress; that I thought a chief justice should be subjected to the mortification of a rejection. The possibility of your rejection was not dreamed of. But I think the conclusion of waiting for confirmation was right on principle.

I now wish to state to you that my first convictions on the subject of who should be appointed, were based on your name. I was confirmed by time, and I tender the nomination to you, to be made on the meeting of congress, in the hope that you will accept and in the full belief that no more acceptable appointment could be made. Very truly yours, U. S. Grant.

The Hon. Roscoe Conkling, U. S. Sen. Utica, N. Y., Nov. 20, 1873. My Dear Mr. President: Your letter of the 8th inst., postmarked 10:30, came bearing my appointment. On the 11th General Hancock mailed a copy, which reached me at New York on the 15th, and the space since then you will not, I think, be too long for me to reflect on. You offer me the chief justiceship, and this confidence outweighs all the honors of the presidency.

I will transfer now from the senate to the bench involves considerations not only beyond those before you, and, after much thought, I am convinced that, in view of the whole case, you would agree with me that another appointment should be made.

I will not detain you with reasons nor with expressions of the profound sense of obligation to you which will abide with me always, but, in fact, I ask you to let your choice fall on another who, however also qualified, believes, as man and lawyer, as I believe, in the measure you have upheld in war and in peace. Your friend and servant, ROSSO CONKLING.

His Excellency, President Gant, Washington, D. C.
